

Generic Mobilities, diversities and “migrancy”

The concept of locality and the dominance of particular understandings of spatiality (namely the national scale) in migration scholarship have been under scrutiny recently. Following this critical reflection, this paper focuses on another blind spot in migration studies, namely on the concept of mobility and the generic mobilities inscribed to migrants. It aims to unravel the discontents of these blind spots for understanding the temporalities and the built in asymmetries in migration studies.
